continue to be important in this age of globalization and information. Equally as important is the development of broad-based people-to-people exchange and business networks among enterprises. There are about a hundred and fifty Japanese firms and close to 30,000 Japanese people residing in Sydney. I would like to combine my efforts with the many Japanese and Australian people who have brought the Australia-Japan relationship to this point through people-to-people exchange and supporting business, and work together with them for the future prosperity of Australia-Japan relations.

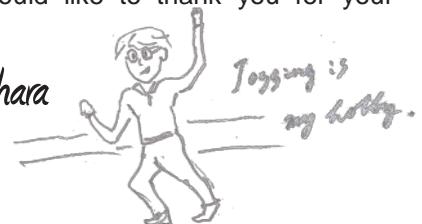

Finally I would like to touch on a practical matter.

As we began 2011, floods greatly impacted on many people around Australia and my thoughts are with those who lost their lives and those affected by the floods.

Australia is of course a relatively safe country but dangers can occur anywhere and it is at such times that it is vital that people's safety can be verified. So to any Japanese national reading this, please register and update your details with the Sydney consulate or your closest Japanese mission if you haven't done so already.

I look forward to having the opportunity to working with many of you throughout 2011. On behalf of the Consulate-General of Japan, I would like to thank you for your continued support.

Masahiro Kohara

Lecture at the Australian Catholic University

Consul-General Kohara delivered a lecture on the Japan-Australia Partnership at the Strathfield Campus of the Australian Catholic University on Wednesday 20 October. Dr Kohara also answered questions from the floor and joined attendees at an afternoon tea held by the School of Arts and Sciences.

The content of his lecture was similar to an earlier address at the University of Sydney (2 September) which can be found on the consulate's website—www.sydney.au.emb-japan.go.jp/document/english/cgspeech_usyd02092010.pdf
